

May 18, 2017

Tokyo, Japan

A little learning is a dangerous thing.

It is necessary for you to get rid of your self-centered indulgence and local greed.

Toshiyuki Namai

It is said, “A little learning is a dangerous thing.” To begin with, I’d like you to carefully think of this idea to deepen the “profundity” of learning for your further intellectual sake.

Quintessentially speaking, culture is not a simply culture itself. This time, you are required to think and grasp the meaning of culture for you to reasonably build what is called “authentic culture” for your fruitful future sake.

As you learned intellectually guided by your instructor, Toshiyuki Namai, culture shall be profoundly interpreted as the meaning of wisdom for the purpose of using many pieces of knowledge you got.

It goes without saying that you need to cultivate your culture “as your own wisdom” in order to do something wonderful and meaningful for the sake of happiness of others who live in your community and society by inches.

This rigidly means that you are guided to make the most of culture, namely wisdom through using various kinds of knowledge you already got as a tool in order to diffuse a sense of happiness to others inch by inch every day.

In most of the cases in this human society, people simply attempt to memorize a lot of matters. In addition, those wish to greedily parade their knowledge they got in the presence of others as a stereotypical way to satisfy their self-centered indulgence and local greed which don't make sense at all.

If you attempt to obtain knowledge for you to just prove "how you have various kinds of knowledge" in the presence of others, such knowledge is unfortunately interpreted just as poor and meaningless knowledge.

Apparently, such knowledge doesn't make sense at all. This means that such knowledge is simply the one as "useless and tasteless information." There is nothing intellectual there you can taste lusciously.